

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

March 21, 2008

I send greetings to those observing National Environmental Crime Prevention Week.

Our Nation has made remarkable progress over the years in protecting our environment and resources, and we must continue this stewardship. During National Environmental Crime Prevention Week, the Environmental Protection Agency coordinates with Federal, State, and local officials to educate the public about the cost of environmental crimes and the signs of criminal activity. By working together, we can wisely manage our natural resources and preserve the land for our children and grandchildren.

I appreciate the EPA and all those who work to protect and improve our environment. Your dedicated efforts help keep America beautiful and build a cleaner, safer, and healthier environment.

Laura and I send our best wishes.
